The recent outbreak of the EndSARS protest in Nigeria against police brutality had the Feminist Coalition and many Nigerian women in impressive attendance. This actuality was consistently predicted over three decades through Nguji wa Thiong'o's late fictions. Against the backdrop of a feminist interrogation of the EndSARS all-inclusive protest, this work seeks to affirm the rife possibility that Nguji's late fictions prophesying a growing female revolutionary tendency arising from Africa are lived out in the Nigerian terrain. In the modern era of gender discourse, is there a meeting pointing between the male and female gender outside patriarchal narratives? Is there a changing paradigm in feministic responses arising from Africa?
